PREFACE

The D scheme of classification represents the present arrangement of the collection of universal and old world history in the Library of Congress. It was first drafted by Mr. Charles Martel, the chief classifier, in 1901 and 1902, but the component schedules were subsequently developed in conjunction with the several classifiers to whom the reclassification of the material in their respective sections was assigned. Mr. W. Dawson Johnston had charge of DA, the first section done; the undersigned, D, DB to DJ, and DQ; Mr. Alexis V. Babine, DK and DR; and Mr. Cecil K. Jones, DP and DT. All the classifiers cooperated to a greater or less extent in the reclassification of the remaining sections, until these, with the exception of DA, gradually came under my general supervision. Upon my resignation in 1906 the work was continued by Mr. J. D. Wolcott, afterwards by Mr. Jacob Lebovitz, later by Mr. George M. Churchill, and, prior to my return to the service in 1913, by Miss Nella J. Martin, each having contributed in some measure to the further development of the several schemes.

As classification means primarily arrangement on the shelves for the purpose of making the literature on a given subject serviceable to him who would consult it, and then the coordination of this literature to related and other material in a logical and practical manner, which calls not only for theoretical knowledge on the part of the classifier but also for his interpretation of practicability and his power to respond to local conditions, thus tending to exhibit his personal inclination, it is evident that where several classifiers have worked on a subject of so many component sections as history, many inequalities will necessarily have developed. Besides, as other sections of the library were reclassified, new problems arose, new relations were established, and consequently new ideas as to grouping and sequence developed. These in turn left their impress on the history schedules then undergoing expansion or revision, and thus in the light of new experience further differences in treatment resulted.

Late in 1913 the present classifier began to readjust such differences as readily lent themselves to this purpose without necessitating too many changes in the shelf list and on the printed cards, until now the scheme has been reduced to as compact and uniform a whole as possible under the circumstances. Certain apparent inequalities, nevertheless, still exist, but these are in the main due to difference of treatment based upon peculiar historical situations and amount of material involved. Where only limited material exists, the classification is naturally not so detailed as in the larger divisions, which in turn occasionally leads to variation in grouping.

In this connection it must be borne in mind, too, that however theoretical the outline may be, the actual arrangement of the books and pamphlets is that of physical sequence on the shelves. At the same time classification is an art as well as a science, and the perfection of form has, accordingly, a legitimate justification. The salient features of an outline should stand out in all possible clearness, details must not obscure essentials, and references to related material should be reduced to a minimum, for it is much more important for the D scheme to show what is classified here than to call attention to what is not. Besides, certain classes of books by reason of their form of treatment belong not with their topic but with the form. For example, however faithful a picture of a war or careful delineation of a ruler it may present, an historical novel belongs as a matter of course in fiction, and special references under every character or event so treated are superfluous.

The philosophy that underlies the classification of history may be briefly outlined. First stands the most universally inclusive literature, subdivided in the more important countries into periodicals and societies, sources and documents, and the collected writings, such as monographs, essays, lectures, etc., of several and individual authors. Upon this follows a grouping of gazetteers, dictionaries, and guidebooks, which leads to the systematic comprehensive treatises comprising both history and description, or works on the topography and geography of a given country. Physical geography, however, is classed in GB.

Now follow the several components of the foregoing, namely, description and travel, social life and customs (including civilization and culture), antiquities, and ethnography and races. In smaller countries these, with the exception of ethnography and races, are often classed together, and in the more primitive countries manners and customs may be grouped with ethnography and races. Literature, however, dealing with social conditions from a sociological point of view is classed in HN, that dealing with the theory of civilization in CB, works on the economic situation in HC, those of a strictly anthropological character in GN, and artistic archeology in N.

Just as a knowledge of the geography of a country is essential to the understanding of its history, so, too, the biographies and memoirs of the men and women who are the chief actors in the daily drama of social, political, and diplomatic life give to history life and warmth, and not infrequently the memoirs of a statesman or court favorite throw more light on an historical situation than do volumes of political theory. Collective biography, accordingly, precedes the general works on the history of a country, while individual biography, including memoirs, recollections, correspondence, etc., is classed with the particular period or reign during which the person in question was especially prominent. Genealogy, however, is classed in CS. It will be observed that the sequence of subdivisions under collective biography is not uniform for all countries. The final form used, for instance, in DL, is an advance over the one first adopted as, for instance, in DD, but because of the mass of material involved, it was deemed inexpedient to strive for absolute uniformity at present, particularly as the change is not of essential significance.

The general works, which in the more important countries are subdivided into those written before 1800 and those since, are as a rule followed by the so-called general special, which might well be termed noncomprehensive, and the minor or pamphlet material of general import. The general literature on the special topics of military, naval, political and diplomatic history comes next, but the more special material is classed with the pertinent period or reign or event, the treatment varying with the individual country. Works on political and constitutional history are, however, classed in J, international law in JX, and military and naval science in U and V.

In the general period divisions there is considerable freedom of treatment, depending now on the amount of literature involved and now on the significance of the historical situation. This obtains also in the individual reigns. For instance, biography and memoirs have in some instances been placed immediately after the sources and documents; in others and more generally in the later schemes, at the extreme end of the pertinent reign or period, where, by reason of their magnitude and miscellaneous character, they constitute a better group than immediately preceding systematic treatises.

At the end of each country division are placed the component provinces and districts, rivers, lakes, mountains, cities, towns, etc. Here is classified everything within the scope of history and description having distinctly local interest. Only when it has a more general bearing does a local event go with the general period or reign, while colonial history as a whole is regularly classed in JV.

Other details have been incorporated in the index, where it is felt that the average user of the scheme will look for guidance, and which has been constructed from the viewpoint that it is an integral part of the scheme of classification.

With reference to the notation it may be stated that its object is location on the shelves. A decimal, therefore, does not necessarily imply subarrangement, for it may have been employed, as in DC 36.9, merely because no whole number happened to be available at that particular place. So, too, .A2 is frequently used to group a given class immediately before another, as, for example, under DC 73, Charlemagne, .A2 stands for sources and documents, whereas general modern works on his life and reign are arranged alphabetically by author, beginning with .A3. A number in parenthesis, as (D 199), indicates that it is to be used for cross reference only, while the material is classed elsewhere.

The history classification is in its general design and in many details the work of Mr. Martel. To Miss Mary W. MacNair the scheme owes its consistency of phraseology, typographical form, and index; and the construction of the scheme throughout has been under the supervision of the chief classifier, Mr. Perley.
